James had always been fascinated by both IT and jiu-jitsu. Growing up, he realized he took after his father in this respect. His father was a software engineer by day and a jiu-jitsu black belt by night. James admired
5 how his father could effortlessly deal with both worlds and knew he wanted to live up to that legacy.

Throughout his teenage years, James spent countless hours coding, often running into complex problems that would make others give up. But not 10 James. He had a knack for breaking down complicated algorithms and finding solutions, much like how he would break down an opponent's defense (or face) in a jiu-jitsu match.

His dedication paid off when he graduated from 15 university and earned a job offer from a prestigious tech firm called Smartmatic. However, he couldn't bring himself to turn down the opportunity to pursue jiu-jitsu competitively. After pondering for a while, he decided to put off the job offer and chase his dream of winning 20 a neighborhood jiu-jitsu championship.

It wasn't easy. Training sessions were demanding, but he never gave up. He applied the same determination he had in programming to improve his fighting skills. In between training, he still picked up 25 freelance coding jobs to support himself financially. He knew he had to look after his career, even while chasing his athletic dreams.

One day, as fate would have it, he ran into an old friend who also happened to be a recruiter for a 30 renowned tech company. They chatted, and James' friend mentioned an opening that sounded perfect for James' skill set. Excitedly, James applied and soon gained a valuable connection within the industry.

Balancing both worlds was tough, but James 35 looked forward to proving his mettle. And he did. He not only won the national jiu-jitsu championship but also earned a top position in the tech company after impressing them with his coding skills. James had managed to live up to his father's legacy and even carve 40 out his unique path.
